Neo-Tech is an idea system based on Ayn Rand's Objectivism, and mostly compatible with it, with integrated influences from such areas as Psychology, Science and Business Management. Neo-Tech was set forth by Frank R. Wallace (pen name of Wallace Ward). Its primary and most accessible book is the so-called "Neo-Tech Discovery", but has a lot of other literature. Neo-Tech can be classified as a brand of Neo-Objectivism. Eric Savage says, Objectivism "is the most powerful tool for identifying reality and acting rationally a person can have" and that with the foundation of Objectivism, "the world will prosper like never before once it learns how to think and act upon reality rather than upon mysticism, deception, and wishful thinking." However, he says "to fully realize this goal, the reality-based concepts of Objectivism must be combined with the fully integrated honesty, high-effort business mode of Neotech." Wallace says that Objectivism has an "an obstructionist leadership" that "demands "purity" before any new action can be taken," so that "it effectively blocks practical, wide-scope applications of Objectivism in most areas of human life and business. Those ever-tightening circles of purity kept everyone ignorant of the wider-scope visions needed to evolve Objectivism into a civilization for the entire planet." He says Neo-tech is "the business/application mode of Objectivism." As a self-described "dynamic" form of objectivism, Neo-Tech departs from Randian Objectivism which it refers to as "static.
